

Review of Compton Scattering Projects,
A. D'ANGELO, INFN - The backward scattering of Laser light against high energy electrons may be used to produce highly polarized and tagged photon beams. The general characteristics of these beams are outlined and the application of this technique to different electron accelerators is reviewed. Results from existing experiments are presented with an outlook to planned future installations.